This microbrewery proposal is a really thoughtful way to bring a long-forgotten piece of land back to life in Holmfirth. The design makes great use of materials already on site, like reclaimed stone, which ties the building into the look and feel of the town. It takes inspiration from Holmfirth's mills and old weavers' cottages, using quality materials that will last and age well—so it'll feel like part of the place from day one.

I like the way the building has been designed to sit within the landscape following the natural slope of the land so it doesn't overpower nearby buildings, especially the old factory next door. It manages to feel new and fresh, but still clearly connected to Holmfirth's past.

What's especially nice is that the design has been done by a local architect who knows and loves Holmfirth. It's a genuine investment in the town's future, rooted in its past—celebrating things like the old postcard factory and Holmfirth's creative spirit. This feels like exactly the kind of project the town deserves—something useful, beautiful, and proudly local.
