My comment is focussed on the low energy nature of the houses, the fact they will be tenanted and that they are meant for local people.

All these features mean that the development will be an asset to the local area and are intended to continue to be so.

Any houses built to be low energy are an asset to all of us because the techniques being used are paving the way for other builders, also hopefully leading to a rise in demand for such houses from all of us as we see what can be done. And that is apart from the contribution to new zero that they will make.

The houses being tenanted mean that they can stay affordable within the local community.

Planning permission for this development means a positive investment both locally and in a wider area. I do hope to see many more of them
