Castle Hill is a well-known local landmark, visible for miles around. Once it is in view, we are home. How awful to be met with this modern building that looks more like a sports centre or supermarket than part of a heritage asset, which is the current designation of Castle Hill. The facts that it is to be built on greenbelt land, will be lit up at night do not sit well with previous statements which say that any development should preserve or enhance the site. The matter of traffic is another problem. Granted this is supposedly going to be solved by some complicated traffic lights system. What happens to through traffic on Lumb Lane when there is a queue waiting for a green light to go up the hill to the site? I am not against development of any kind there, but something more in keeping with the local architecture in both materials and scale would surely be more suit able? Kirklees, please think again.
