Claims that the landscape is too steep are entirely baseless. There were tonnes there before the monstrosity was built, and frankly the least they could do is return them to shield what they've built and return it to the same quality as before. A wildflower meadow is never going to provide any future screening of the buildings impacting on the long term natural environment in the area and also I would imagine will not have the same effect of reducing carbon emissions as trees would have done. This is an example of the company being cheap and locals will not stand for it.
