As biodiversity officer for House Martin Conservation UK & Ireland, I'd like to highlight that the ecological site survey was undertaken in winter before summer migrants return, and that house martins have been observed foraging over the site for many years, a species that is now on the red list in the UK. We object to the loss of this important foraging habitat, and if any development does go ahead it should include mitigation measures such as artificial nest cups for house martins, water features designed for availability of mud for additional nest building, and replacement high-quality foraging habitat on site such as open water and meadow, following guidance from a suitably qualified ecologist.
