I think this is rather impressive. Holmfirth needs new modernist looking buildings otherwise it will get stuck in some kind of architectural timewarp of not really impressive buildings (and the other buildings are not even if listed). This is not too out of keeping with the area and given the nature of the previous use of the land it is appropriate. It also has a unique quality to it from what appears to be a very good architect which is acceptable under planning rules. Whilst one appreciates concerns about traffic it was in the past used commercially and a micro-brewery is not going to make a substantial addition to already traffic issues. And in terms of green concerns, perhaps an eco-roof garden might make a positive gain to bird and wildlife in a sadly denuded town centre (or solar panels). And there won't be much noise addition - if any from such a development. This is good and should be applauded. it is not on green land, it's a brownfield site and makes good sense to allow it.
