This large monolith of a property was built within the last 10 years, replacing a small bungalow on the site. The original bungalow sat at a distance from the site boundaries. The new building pushes the limits of the site boundaries, such that its bulk lies very close to the lane/public footpath which runs alongside it, creating an oppressive feel along the path. This new proposal further pushes the site boundary to the extreme, creating a 5m long by almost 3m tall wall within 50mm of the existing lane/footpath. This will further increase the oppressiveness and character of this heavily used footpath. With the original building having been permitted with at least a minimal 'breathing space' at the site boundary, why should this space now be lost within a few years of the original design permissions?
