The demolition of an historic building is clearly not in the public or community's interest. The Shears Public House not only has historical significance but is one of a few remaining characterful buildings in an area which in many people's view, has been over-developed. This over-development is absolutely to the detriment of local area, depriving future generations of much needed green space and of any original character left in the locality, though I'm quite sure many a developer has made lots of money out of the numerous high priced residential developments. Not only is the development not needed but to even consider the demolition of such a significant piece of local history is I feel quite shocking. Given the public outcry the last time these plans were submitted and then rejected, I find it extraordinary that just two years later we are having to go through the same objection process - is it the plan for developers to continually submit proposals until they eventually have their own way? I hope not - and I hope that Kirklees and those responsible for planning do the right thing and turn down this proposal.
